Hi Eve,

There isn't any problem between us, and we are OK, but I did choose to put a bit more distance between us, and I can tell you why. Essentially, I had the feeling, over multiple interactions with you, that I was doing or had done something wrong. It's not a normal experience for me, in general. I don't know if it comes from me, if I was picking up on something you were experiencing, or if it was happening in the space between us, but I didn't like all the post processing and stress that seemed to come up after interactions with you. I didn't feel like we had enough of a foundation to make it worth trying to figure out or solve. But I don't feel like you have done anything wrong, or anything hurtful. I'm sorry that ironically, I may have left you with that idea. Also, for what it's worth, our wedding venue could only hold about 30 people, and family had to be prioritized, so a lot of people didn't get invited.

Please also know that my connection to just about everyone outside of a couple of people is distant, and it really has nothing to do with them. Everyone connected to Franklin, in particular, seems to be in some kind of great stress or pain, and every time I think of some small way to integrate back into that network, all I feel is that stress and pain, and so I just opt out.

I am willing to talk to you about whatever is happening with Franklin, and I can try to just give you insight based on my specific experience with him if that would help. If you want actual perspective though, like a neutral perspective, I'm unlikely to be able to provide that, because at one time or another I've talked to just about everyone about everyone else, and There is just.so.much.pain, and honestly, at this point it mostly just makes me angry. So, I guess just consider that. Sometimes someone who is not involved at all can be a better sounding board. However if what you need is perspective that is specific to the nesting experience with him, I can try to offer some.

Best,
